

A black and white photograph of a protest scene. In the center, a person wearing a dark hoodie, a mask, and a backpack is captured mid-air with both arms raised in a gesture of defiance. They are surrounded by several riot police officers in full gear, including helmets and shields. The background shows a city street with trees, buildings, and a 'RIGHT LANE' sign. The overall atmosphere is one of civil unrest.

A black and white photograph of a Black Panther Party march. In the foreground, a man in a Black Panther uniform, including a beret and sunglasses, is walking. Behind him, other participants are visible, some holding flags that say "FREE Huey P. Newton". The word "Background" is overlaid in large, red, outlined letters across the center of the image.

Dancers Commemorative

A woman in a yellow long-sleeved shirt and a blue face mask is dancing in the center of a large, diverse crowd. She has her arms outstretched. The crowd consists of people of various ages and ethnicities, many wearing face masks. Some people are holding signs, including one that says "TO THE". The scene appears to be an outdoor gathering or protest.

Dancers Active

A group of dancers, mostly women, are shown from the chest up, wearing dark tank tops. They are all looking upwards with their arms raised high, palms facing forward. The scene is dimly lit with a strong red or orange glow, creating a dramatic and intense atmosphere. The background is dark, making the dancers and their raised hands stand out.

Dust Fragments

I was interested in using fragments of dust as a projection idea to add to the tension between self-expression and self-denial by evoking "that world unmusical of earth and stone," where beauty is stripped of its vitality and reduced to lifeless reflection. I love the choreographic oscillation between graceful and fragmented movements, so the projections could echo this contrast, shifting between luminous clarity and chaotic, disjointed patterns.

Shard Fragments

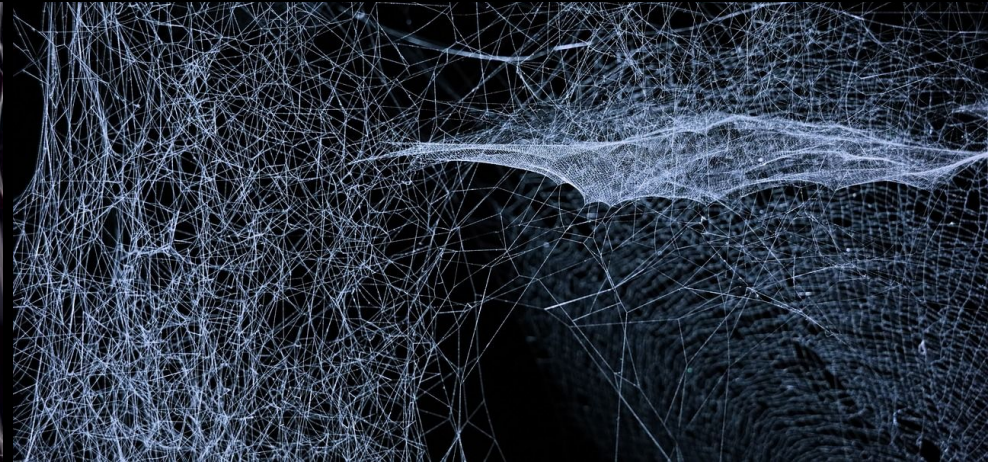

Shards of glass inspired me because their fractured surfaces and interplay with light can obscure and distort images, but also reflect them. Especially since the poem critiques reflective light, this could be an option if we want to delve more into that critique.

Natural Fragments

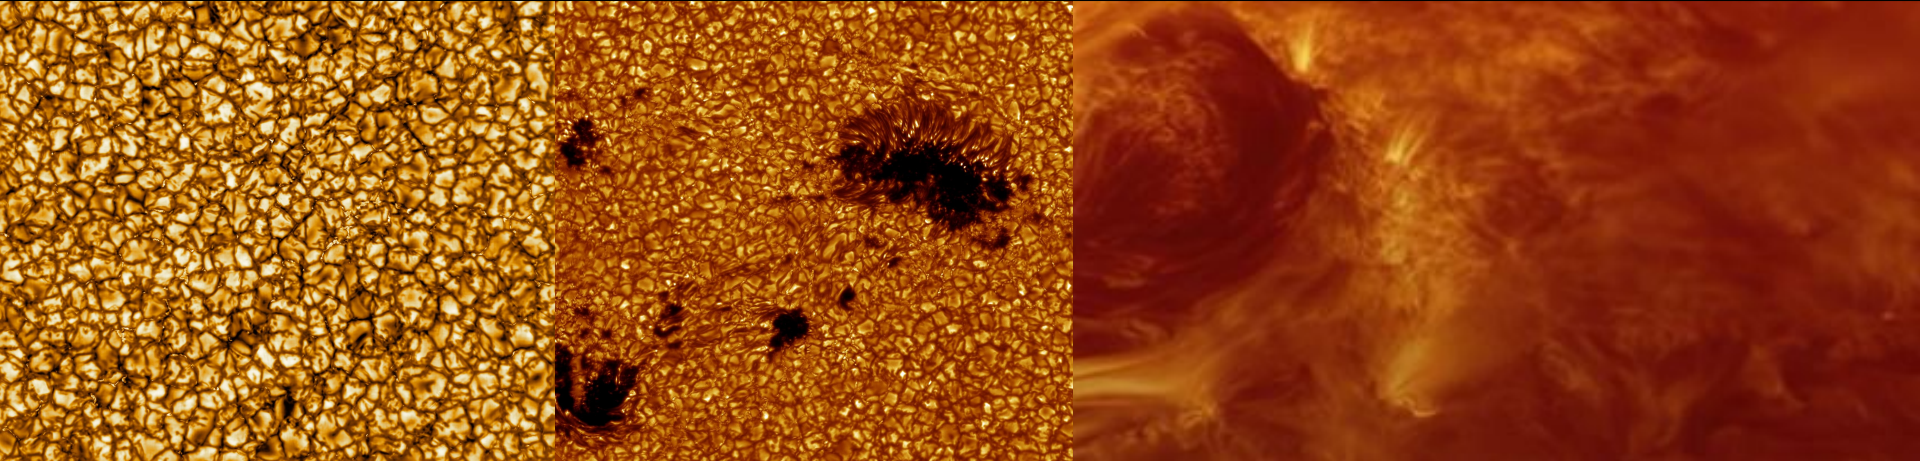

I love the beauty of spiderwebs shining in the reflection of the night sky, but their contorted, twisted design also sparks a dreamlike sense of fragility and vulnerability. A single spider independently designs their web, and that concept appeals to me as a representation of strength and intricate creativity.

Sun and Moon Fragments

The surface of the sun and moon appears to be filled with fragmented textures, and each crack and crater represents enduring forces and the ability to withstand constant change. Consequently, these imperfections inspire me as they reflect strength found in survival and adaptation over time.

Bat Colonies

The bat imagery was inspired from the beginning of the poem, where Coleridge writes “To summon owls and bats upon the wing.” I am not as interested in the skies here; I am more interested in the disjointed, collective movement creating an unsettling, fragmented feeling.

The owl eyes are also inspired by the “summon” line. Owl eyes, adapted for the darkness, symbolize an ability to navigate the shadowy, unseen realms, potentially reflecting the dichotomy of illumination and obscurity in the piece.

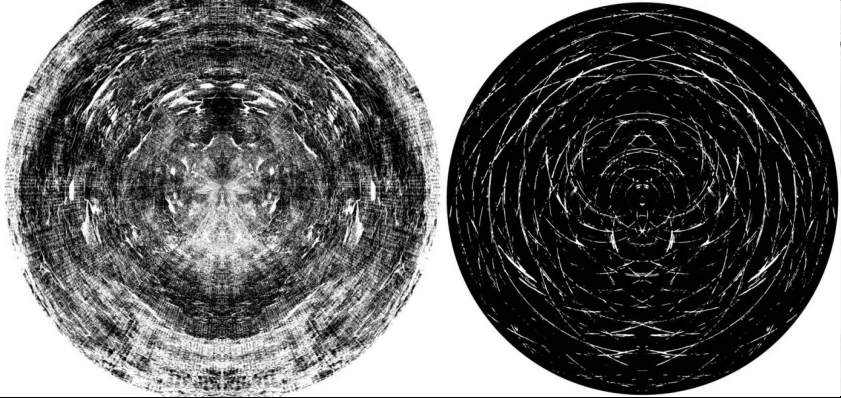

Dancer Shadows

I was also interested in the possibility of using dancer shadows to amplify the interplay of light and movement. Since this piece is traveling on tour, if interested in this, I'd have to explore a way to create these in a way that can be taken with us (i.e. without a scrim), but I believe I can create a version that we could project on the back cyc.

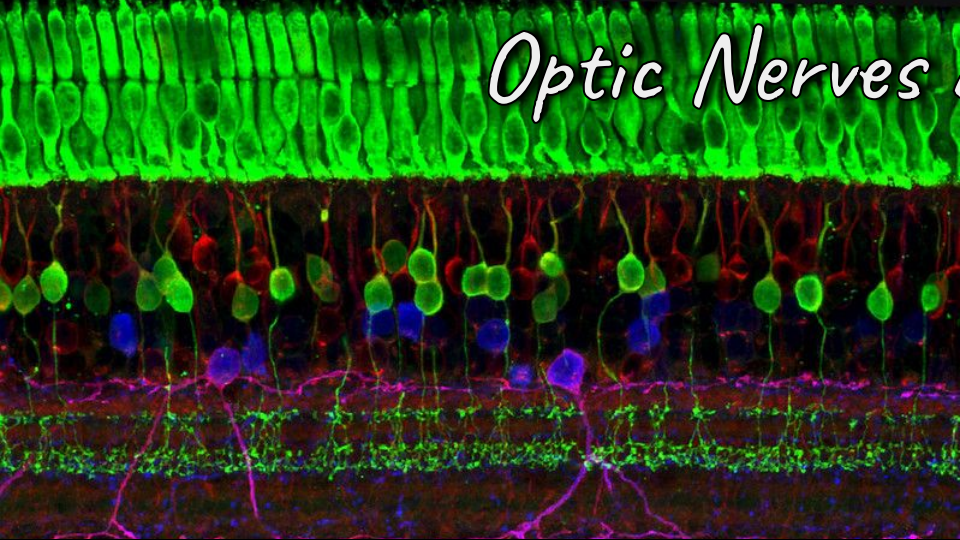

Optic Nerves and Shadows

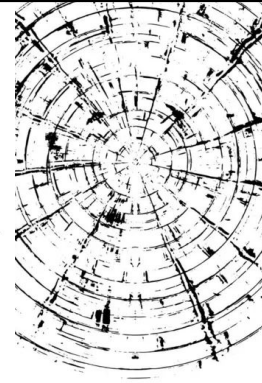

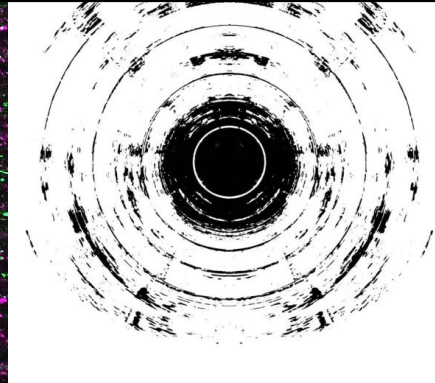

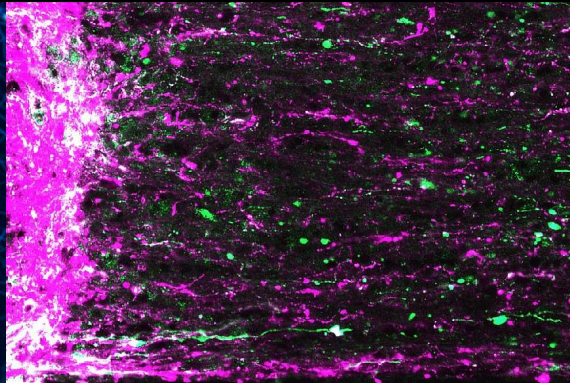

I feel that the poem's praise of direct light over reflected light aligns with the metaphorical function of the optic nerves—direct conduits for light to the brain, symbolizing unmediated understanding. Incorporating "shadowy dissonance" could emphasize the tension between clarity and obscurity too.

Optic Nerves and Synapses

I explored how light is received and processed in the "living brain" through the optic nerves, where direct light is transformed into signals that form the basis of the human brain's perception, understanding, and agency. Displaying the transmitting of direct light within the optic nerves and synapses in sync with the dance could be an option for projections as well.
